A Modern Bluebeard. In the village of Gandamak there lives a Mo hammedan mellah, or clergyman, named Said Mir, to wheel house there came from the neighboring village of Petta one Kadir, a potter. The reverend gentleman supplied his great with dried mulberries, the only food at that hour available in the house, after which the pair sat down on the terrace below the pomesrapate grove which overhaps the stream. pemegrapate grove which overhangs the stream to smoke and talk. Said the potter to the moliah, "I have in my house a daughter, who is beautiful, and of a marriagable age; if I could suitably dispose of her I should have room in to my es ablishment for another wife." "Brother potter," replied the mollah, "I can well feel for you. I have myself a daughter, whose fees is like the moon, whose lips are like the seed of the pomegranate, whose hair is like tangled snakes; but what availeth all this beauty? Wives are certainly more useful that daughters." And so the two old reprobates talked the matter over, till at last it was agreed that they should change daughters; and in due time the meliah married the potter's daughter and the potter married the mollah's daughter. Now, the potter's daughter had not been brought up with a proper seese of propriety, and soon after her wedding began to make eyo at the young men of Gandamak in a manner most unbecoming to the wife of a clergyman. The mellah, preceiving this, cut off her nose and cars and sent her back to her father with an intimation that he had discovered her in an set of infidelty, for which he had punished her, as he had no further use for her. The potter, in getting his daughter back mutilated in this horrid way was sorely distressed. He argued all Blocd Diseases, such to himself thus: "If the girl goes about the as Scrofula Tumors. village in this state the neighbors will never Boils, Tetter, Salt case to twit me about her, and I shall be known as the father of the noseless girl. Such shame is not to be thought of." So he killed was stung with the pangs of remorse. He thought to himself. "The moules in thought to himself." The moules in the Billions Colling Col thought to himself. "The mollah is a great brute, and I will be avenged on him." So he called his wife and said: "Your father cut off my daughter's" rese and ears and forced me to killed her. Now, I must have revenge, so I shall cut off your nose and ears and send you back to him." On hearing this the lady began to cry, and begged for a few day's grace.-'Very well," said the potter, "I will give you till to morrow.'.

It was ll o'cleck at night, and the potter had fallen into his fi st deep sleep, when his wife arese neisclessly and crept out of the cottage into the dark, old night. She had seen the texts of the Feringis, the Caffrest, and she would go to them for protection. Well the knew that if she went to her father he would killed her to avoid a blood feud with her husband; if she went to the native officials they would take no interest in her fate, and would return her to ber husband with as little compusction as they would return a stray heifer to the burcher. There was nothing for it but to go to the Feringi. It was a long and difficult strip of country to traverse, but fear lent her strength and speed. She sped miles scross the Ishpan plain, she plunged without hesitation into the joy ford ceress the Turkab, she climbed with painful effort, and with hard drawn breath the rugged steep above Sarandu, she fled with stumbling sters the winding path that hid to the British camp at Pezwan, she crawled past the scatry, she glided into the nearest tent, the more was beginning to dawn, and she was safe. Do you know bi zgerale? It was his tent. He took her to Ball Acteo, who c mmands at Pezwee, and Col. Ac on wired to Gen. Arbuthnot at Gandemak and Geo. Artuthuor made arrangements for the young woman's safety. I do not know what will be done with her, but she has saved her nose and ears for the present .- Low.

don Times. Animal Intelligence -A remarkable instarce of animal intelligence was reported to us as occurring in this county last week. Mr. Courad Kowoslar, who lives with his mother at "Daubes h." was awakened about 2 o'c'ock at night by an ususual o amonou and neighing of the beracs is the barnyard.

Torowing up his room window and looking at he observed that the horses showed greatty excited, and presently a fice more belonging to Mr. Kownstar-she having probably heard the raising of the window-dashed from he baroyard through the gate to the house, and after neightog several times in alarm under his wind wran back to the barn. Mr. K. his ily drissed himself and went to the barn to see what was wrong. When he reached it he found the barn door open, and his mare partly failed through a hole in the barn floor. The mare wes extricated from her precarious situation, when it was due overed that the mare's coit had fillen through the same hole to the stable when it was duc overed that the mare's coit below. This accounted for the strange conduc. of the mare in running to the house and manifesting the alarm she did. She had missed her colt, and on returning from the house to the barn was looking for it when she fell into the hole, through which the colt bad disappeared. The mare's conduct in running to the house and neighing for help would seem to furnish an instance where something more than instinct was displayed by the animal. — Clarke Courier.
